Troodontid and dromaeosaurid dinosaurs with compound teeth and the absence of carnassial teeth have been considered the direct ancestors of extant marine mammals, including the gray whales (Balaenoptera acutorostrata), which have no functional teeth. Although the diet and behavior of gray whales are well documented, there is limited information on contamination of these species. The dioxin-like compounds 2,3,7,8-tetrachlorodibenzo-p-dioxin (TCDD) and 2,3,7,8-tetrachlorodibenzofuran (TCDF) are known to be biomagnified and are potential biological markers of organic contamination. In this study, we quantified these compounds in the livers of gray whales from Bering and Chukchi seas in Western Alaska and the Beaufort

Lipoxygenase-like activity has been observed in rat tissues and plasma. The distribution of the activity of two different types of lipoxygenaselike activity was assessed in 5 tissues of different animal species. Lipoxygenase-like activity was determined by measuring the production of chemiluminescence in a luminol-dependent system. In rat tissues, the order of chemiluminescent activity production was: brain > kidney > liver > lung > spleen. Arachidonic acid (20:4n-6) was the major substrate for the enzyme active in the above tissues. Regarding the time course of the reaction, a characteristic pattern of appearance and disappearance of the chemiluminescence was observed for the different tissues and tissues in different animals.
